When Guards Know Prisoners Too Well

Robert Blocker

In a prison of trimmed law, life is a question of maintaining law. But what happens when they are not at the top of their game? The DC Department of Corrections faces a series of challenges, including the need for better-trained officers and improved facilities. The lack of proper supervision and training is a major concern, leading to a series of incidents that have raised questions about the department's ability to maintain order.

However, some prison officers proudly boast that they are not afraid of the job. They say they have a special bond with the inmates, and that their job is to help them turn their lives around. But this bond comes at a cost. The officers often find themselves caught in the middle of power struggles and conflicts.

The Washington Post